Loss: Complicated and Disenfranchised Grief
Along the Life Cycle

Frontiers in Psychology

The experience of losing a loved one is one of the crucial and most difficult experiences than individuals may cope during their life-time. Disenfranchised griefs may appear when the loss is not acknowledge by the social environment. Examples are perinatal grief, loss due to the diagnosed of a chronic condition, grief due to mental illness, loss of a job or loss of a pet.

We are calling for papers including original studies, systematic reviews or theoretical articles on assessment, diagnosis, obstacles or barriers perceived by health-care professionals, as well as interventions and treatments in these populations. We also welcome novel approaches to grief and bereavement including, but not limited to, developing new assessment tools to explore the experience of the bereaved, analyzing grief trajectories, comparison of prolonged/complicated grief criteria, ambiguous loss, chronic sorrow, or psychotherapy approaches to grief and loss.
